Dissertation Title	The study of Public relations and customer satisfaction in the wireless telecommunication industry in Malaysia
Date	30 th November 2007
Keywords	Public Relations Customer satisfaction Customer loyalty

ABSTRACT:

In recent years, growth in telecommunication industry in Malaysia had slowed down due to market saturation. This had eventually resulted to high competition among wireless telecommunication provider to win more market shares from their competitors. And high involvement needed to retain their existing customers and safe their customer base.

In this situation, public relations and customer satisfaction is being questioned either it does help to customer loyalty and brand awareness toward the telecommunication service providers.

The aims of this project were to identify the factors which contribute to good public relations. Customers' satisfaction is evaluated through their involvement in public relations programs and their satisfactions that they expressed.

Among the factor that investigated in this project is usage of media as communication medium to promote before and after a public relations event. Media does play its important role in bringing public relations programs to success by providing a well defined medium for communication between the telecommunication providers and their 'publics' which refers to their customers and potential customer in the current market.

Most telecommunication industry players that believe and interested in Public relations activities will conduct their own event or program to impress their customer. And if the organization does not have the capability of conducting events by themselves, they still have option to select a PR firm and out source the PR event management to them. Customer satisfaction is the motive behind any public relations event that conducted by an organization.
